LOCATION
Nant yr Eira Forest is located centrally to the timber markets in Wales to the north of Talerdig just 5 miles off the A470. Visitors should approach from the south along the mountain road signed off the A470 to "Llanerfyl 11". Access off this road is best at point X on the sale plan.

DESCRIPTION
Nant yr Eira forest is a rare offering in this part of Wales. The combination of soils and moist climatic factors show just how productive the perfect sites in Wales can be. This land holding represents one of the best examples of large commercial forestry in Wales where 1970s crops have been managed sensitively for their longevity and sustainability.

The forest was originally established in two main tranches with the northern lower lying section close to the Afon Gam created in the late 1960s, and the southern Mynydd Rhyd Ddu (mountain) section in the early 1970s. Species mix was and still is primarily Sitka spruce. This species is an excellent choice for this site type and has grown very well since planting. Of the original crops approximately 100 hectares (247 acres) still remains ready for immediate harvest, subject to felling permission from Natural Resources Wales (NRW).

Initially the forest was managed in the conventional way, with a small amount of thinning and with the long term intention to restructure using clearfell and replant. On change of management in 1992 an extensive thinning programme, designed to change the previous financial model, through early returns, extended over a large part of the forest. This continued until 2005 when the current manager took over.

Since then the entire forest has been managed by applying principles of selective management, thinning both semi-mature and younger trees, to promote natural regeneration and improve timber quality, aimed at creating a sustainable and regular income from a valuable forestry asset. Due to highly variable site conditions this has produced a mosaic of areas of varying sizes reflecting the constraints imposed by topography and drainage. Where the site conditions are not constrained, the forest takes on the appearance of a truly natural and long established treescape.

Overall visitors will be impressed with the sheer quantity of mature timber within the forest as well as the obvious potential of the younger replanted areas, many of which have been thinned to increase the average tree size and improve and smooth the frequency and size of timber returns.

Access to the forest is excellent with a well established forest road system serving all parts of the wood. The main entrance is shown as point X on the sale plan. These roads, that include two Irish bridges and several culverts, have been very well built to almost Forestry Commission specification and are more than capable of handling heavy timber haulage vehicles. Maintenance of these roads is up to date.

At the northern end of the forest are two Dutch barns that presumably housed sheep before the forest was established. These may be useful in the future if the forest was developed for alternative activities.
